

Traveling often as both a passenger and a Flight Attendant I think it would be a mistake to overturn current rules banning cell phone use. We all know there is a lack of personal space on aircraft as it is. People talking on cellular phones literally within inches of others would be a direct intrusion on the little personal space allotted to each passenger. It would be nearly impossible for a passenger to read, work, rest, etc. while sitting along side someone who is engaged in a cellular phone conversation. If the rules were changed I believe we would find that it was in error but would have a difficult time changing them back again. Thank you for your consideration.
